

OBJECTIONS WHILE DIALING: Objection Handbook

Psychology and Tactics

The primary goal of dialing is to book the appointment. Rehearse the objections below until you can respond effortlessly, maintaining a smooth transition.

While having rebuttals for objections is important, it's even more crucial to understand WHY you say what you say and recognize your position in the client-agent relationship.

Key Mindset

Position yourself as the professional providing protection and peace of mind for their family. You are helping, not selling. When clients ask questions, they are merely seeking clarification on how to achieve their goal – protecting their family. You are in control because they have filled out a request for your service.

Posture and control: You are the doctor, and they are the patient. You are simply there to guide them to what they need. Focus on asking questions. Remember: "Whoever asks the most questions wins!" Maintain control and structure, as they need your help. Yes/Yes questions are your best tool outside of rhetorical questions.

First Response to Any Objection

- "That's exactly why I'm calling." This is your interrupt phrase, creating a smooth transition for you to overcome the objection and keep control of the conversation.

The AAA Technique:

- Agree. Acknowledge. Ask a Question.
 - New agents: Get a sticky note and tape it on your laptop. Remember the Triple A technique and apply it to every objection.

Key Words & Phrases to Use:

- Perfect: This word helps you relate. Whatever they say, agree with it and guide them back to the preso.
 - Listen: Signals that what you're about to say is important and that you are here to help them get the protection they need.

Common Objections and Responses

1. "I'm not interested"

- Option 1: "Okay, were you not interested because of the price or you just don't think you can qualify?"
 - Follow-up: "I'm an insurance broker offering discounted rates. Were you looking for coverage just for yourself?"
- Option 2: "No worries. I'm not interested either. I just need to go over this information because it's state-regulated. You put down your DOB as [____]. Is that correct?"
- Option 3: "That's exactly why I'm calling, so I can resolve this and get you off the list. You put down [address], right?"
- Option 4 (Jokingly): "I haven't even said anything interesting yet, so I totally get it."

2. "How did you get my information?"

- "I'm with the NAIC (National Association of Insurance Commissioners). We handle underwriting for every A to A+ rated carrier. When you initially filled this out, was it just for you, or did you have a spouse in mind too?"

3. "What is this for?"

- "This is regarding the request you submitted for life insurance. Was your main concern final expenses, or were you looking to leave a legacy to your family?"

4. "I don't remember filling anything out"

- "No worries, I don't remember what I had for breakfast today either! You listed your DOB as [____]. Does that sound right?"
 - Follow-up: "It looks like it was about a month ago. We're a little behind, but when you filled this out, were you looking for coverage just for yourself or a spouse too?"

Special Objections

Already Have Coverage

- Option 1: "Awesome, that's exactly why I'm calling – to make sure you aren't overpaying and that your policy has living benefits. This will only take 10 minutes, can you grab a pen and paper?" you might qualify for a rate reduction.
Can i level with you, you man to man, Why you giving me a hard time im just adirector - im just here trying to help you get a better deal i see your name on highlighted in red which is why I am calling.

- Option 2: "Perfect! That's why I'm calling. I'm just a policy service director, ensuring you have adequate coverage and no gaps. Can you grab a pen and paper?"
- Option 3: "Great, when you originally got that policy, was it for final expenses, to cover debts, or to leave a legacy?"

Coverage Through Work

- "Gotcha! Group work policies are usually cheap or even free, which is awesome. But if you ever stop working, that coverage won't be there. Let's go over options that will offer permanent protection that you actually own."

Private Coverage

- "Okay, let's get this updated for you so you stop receiving these calls. Did you get this coverage within the last year, or have you had it for a while?"
 - Follow-up: "Looks like you may be due for a rate reduction. The original agent may have placed you in a standard health class, which could have led to higher rates. Do any of these apply to you? (smoking, blood pressure, cholesterol, diabetes)"
 - "Did the agent inform you about the standard health class?"

Bert Wallace Specific Responses

"I'm not interested" (Bert's Approach)

- Option 1: "I totally hear you, Client. But you did fill out a request, and I just need to confirm some details. I'm a senior medical underwriter here, and I'll make sure you're not overpaying. Was this mainly for yourself, or did you have a spouse in mind?"

"How did you get my information?" (Bert's Approach)

- "Client, I'm with the NAIC. We're the underwriters for all top-rated carriers. When you filled this out, were you just looking for yourself or did you have a spouse in mind as well?"

"I already have coverage" (Bert's Approach)

- "Great, Client. That's why I'm calling – to make sure you're not overpaying and that your policy has all the living benefits it could offer. I just need 10 minutes. Can you grab a pen and paper?"

Action Steps to Master Objections:

1. Massive Activity: The more objections you face, the better you'll get at handling them.
2. Mindset: Stay in the right mental space. You're the doctor, they're the patient. Reaffirm your purpose.
3. Practice, Drill, Rehearse: Practice objection-handling daily. Your tone, word choices, and confidence are everything.

"I have Coverage through work"

- The response nicely paints a picture of why work coverage isn't enough, focusing on what happens if they can't work due to illness or injury. The key point is about helping them understand the gap between work coverage and individual insurance.

"I'm not healthy enough to qualify"

- This reply highlights a real-life success story, building confidence by showing that qualifications are possible even with severe health conditions. It also shifts the focus to understanding the client's exact needs, whether for final expenses or other concerns.

"Can you just email this to me?"

- The response emphasizes the need to understand the client's situation before sending anything, pushing them to provide more context about their needs. It keeps the conversation active and ensures you're sending the most relevant information.

"I don't have time / I'm at work"

- The response is flexible, acknowledging their current situation and respecting their time. The approach offers solutions (like setting up an appointment or confirming a couple of things quickly), with a focus on ensuring the conversation remains valuable even if brief.

"I was just shopping around"

- This is a great approach for addressing clients who may be hesitant or focused too much on price. It reaffirms the value you provide by doing all the shopping around for them, offering a tailored plan, and asking questions that help uncover the true reason they're interested in insurance.

"I want to think about it"

- This response is gentle but persuasive, suggesting submitting an application as a way to see if they even qualify. It stresses that no commitments are required today and that it's just a step to see what's available for them, easing the client into a decision-making process without pressure.

"Why do you need my social?"

No worries, I totally understand, Mary! So, since no one is coming to your home and doing things like drawing blood or testing you in any way, that information goes directly to the MIB, the Medical Information Bureau. They pull your medical records and history from there to check if you're healthy enough for the coverage. Does that make sense?

This is simply to run your Social Security number through the MIB to verify your medical history and prescriptions so they can confirm you're eligible for coverage.

“Why do you need my account number?”

Absolutely, I understand. The insurance company needs your account number just to make sure there's no fraudulent activity happening under your name, and if you're approved, it'll allow for the automatic withdrawal on the date you've chosen (like January 1st). Does that make sense?

Basically, it's just to ensure that the account is legitimate and belongs to you. No payments will be taken until the policy is submitted, and you'll get the physical policy in the mail so you can review it. You can even cancel or adjust at any time.

“I'm a veteran, I'm fully covered.”

First, thank you for your service! I actually used to work exclusively with veterans and the VA, and I know that unfortunately, their coverage doesn't always go far enough. For example, the VA only provides $700 for plot allowance and $2000 for service-related deaths. What I'm offering here is permanent coverage that works alongside your VA benefits to make sure EVERYTHING is covered. Let's make sure you have full peace of mind, okay?

“I want to self-insure or I have savings.”

Congratulations on building that savings, that's awesome! But just like you have car insurance, mortgage insurance, and phone insurance, wouldn't you rather have the insurance company take on that risk? You don't want to drain savings that could go toward other things for your family, right?

Let me ask you this: What happens if an emergency comes up while you're still alive? Now your savings are gone, and then what happens to your family after that? Life insurance ensures they're protected permanently, and your savings can still be the cherry on top.

“That's not my DOB.”

No problem, let me just confirm a couple of things with you. Are you still at [city, state]? Perfect, and were you applying for coverage just for yourself, or were you considering adding a spouse as well?

"I'm donating my body to science."

I completely understand your decision! That's an amazing choice, but donating your body to science doesn't fully cover all the expenses. There are still transportation and other fees to consider. Let's take a few minutes to go over options that will ensure everything is covered. Do you have a pen and paper handy?

Questions to ask:

- When you filled this out, were you looking for coverage just for yourself, or did you have a spouse in mind as well?
 - Were you primarily looking to cover funeral expenses, ensure your mortgage is paid off, or leave some money behind for your family?
 - Who will be responsible for taking care of funerals and final arrangements when something happens to you?
 - Do you know if you prefer burial or cremation? In [state], do you know how much burial/cremation typically costs?

Pressure/Value Statements:

- I understand it's tough financially right now, but if something were to happen and you have no coverage, it will be very difficult for your family. Let's just try to get you approved for the bare minimum now, and when things improve—as they always do—you can increase your coverage later. Does that sound fair?
- If you don't take action now, who is going to come out of pocket for your final expenses? Do they have an extra $20,000 sitting aside? Would you want to leave that burden to your family if something were to happen tomorrow?
- I don't want you to mistake my passion for pressure, but I've seen the impact of life insurance firsthand. People die every day leaving huge debts for their families. Let's make sure that doesn't happen to you. I'll submit your application, and if you're approved, I'll be here to support you and your family. Does that sound fair?
- I don't have a crystal ball, and neither do you. Death is inevitable, so why not be prepared? Let's at least get something in place today, and if we need to make any changes down the road, we can. Does that make sense?

- I'm here to serve you the best I can, both personally and professionally. If you're honest with me, I can steer you in the right direction. At the end of the day, I work for you.
